Making faces

The cosmetic industry is big business these days – but make-up is nothing new...

Ancient charm

Today, cosmetics are a multi-million pound industry as companies strive to create products to make us look younger and prettier. But apart from the financial aspect, not a lot has changed since the time of the pharaohs.

Looking good was very important to the Ancient Egyptians, as they believed that their appearance was directly related to their spirituality. They were very innovative and came up with all manner of products to treat anything from stretch marks and wrinkles to scars and baldness. They also created face creams, body oils and, of course, eye make-up.

Kohl – still popular today – was used by the Egyptians as an eyeliner and symbol of social rank. It was so essential that containers of it were put in tombs for the afterlife. Ancient Egyptian kohl was made from burnt almonds, oxidized copper, different-coloured copper ores, lead, ash, and ochre. It was applied with a small stick, on and around the eyes, in an almond shape. They also made green from malachite, blue from lapis and white from lead carbonate. These minerals were added to a paste that included frankincense oil, almond oil and goose fat. To complement it, they applied a mixture of red clay and water to their lips and cheeks. To complete the look, nails were dyed orange or yellow with henna.
